The new body, called the Office of Large-Scale Development (OLSD), will be "responsible for long-term strategic planning, public consultation, integrated transportation and infrastructure planning, and the implementation and oversight of large-scale projects." The City estimates the new office will cost $200,000 to set up. The new office is expected to take over oversight from the Community and Rural Development Department, a division that's housed under the City's general manager and council. That division is responsible for the current city plan and zone by-laws, planning studies for new developments, as well as monitoring ca3bfb1094
